"1984" PREMIERE.

Writer George Orwell had a dream - or a nightmare - of what the world might be like in 1984, and put his ideas into a book. The book became a film - and at the film's London Premiere, that vision of the future seems to have spread into the theatre foyer. Extravagant hair-do's mingle with the more orthodox ones as the audience gathers.

Gordon Scott - perhaps better known as Tarzan - is one of the first-sighters. Another is Peter Reynolds.

Kleanor Summerfield with her husband Leonard Sachs.

Distinguished character actor David Kosseff is here, and so is Hazel Court.

Now for a grimmer glimpse into Mr. Orwell's vision of the future - the dreaded Thought Police. But though they're armed to the teeth, somebody seems to be distracting them from looking as grim as they should.

Will we see this sort of thing about our streets in 1984? Your guess is as good as ours. But look out, London - Big Brother is watching you!
