QUEEN AT A-BOMB BASE.

The Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh drive past Valiant bombers and their crews at Marham R.A.F. Station in Norfolk - one of the East Anglian bases from which atomic-bombs could be delivered, if another war were to come. They take a close look at one of the Valiant's - Britain's million-pound bomber which, if the need arose, would do the delivering. During their tour, they were also shown an atomic bomb - but that part of the programme was extremely private.

The Queen doesn't look sure if that's a dummy in the ejector seat - but he's real enough!

Finally, a fly-past in honour of the royal visitors by 72 Canberra light bombers and 20 Valiants - a demonstration of the power Britain can use if she has to, but which all of us hope will never be needed.
