NATO'S TEETH.

United States Forces in Germany put on an air power display for students of the NATO defence College. First, a tactical jump by an airborne infantry company, complete with all its fighting equipment. The officers watching the demonstration come from many different countries, and one object of the College is to give them a thorough understanding of the characteristics and striking power of each others' weapons. Many of these nations, of course, are being supplied with American arms.

The F.86F fighter-bomber makes last-war equipment look like museum pieces - but there are still some weapons which do not change very much. Artillery, the "Queen of Battle" isn't ready to abdicate yet. But already there is a new claimant to the throne - the rocket. Everything's "for peace" these days, as we all know - but with weapons like this Matador Guided Missile capable of crossing continents, politicians had better have some other ideas up their sleeves as well - or one of these days the rockets might start flying - from both sides.
