Game Wardens of Banff National park, in Canada, have a big job on hand - taking a complete census of all their varied charges. Here's a family of big-horn sheep sure footed climbers of the Park's rocky slopes. Of course, there are new arrivals turning up all the time - and very appealing some of them are, like this black bear's twin cubs.

A coyote pup is pulled from his den - another new nose to be counted. It's a thorough survey, and very few manage to dodge the census. Deer are one of the major groups. Idea of the roll call is to find if food supplies will be adequate; for example, the expanding buffalo may be a winter grazing problem. There are elk and moose and many others to be counted. But the wardens agree - it's a happy job.
