

CAMPBELL DOES IT AGAIN:

Donald Campbell prepares - in the traditional English manner - for yet another attack on the world water speed record at Coniston Water. Bluebird II has made the record almost her private property; she's taken it pretty well as high as she's designed to go, but Donald's anxious to step it up just once more before devising a new machine.

Everything's ready - and here comes Bluebird on her first run, building up speed as she approaches the start of the measured mile. The existing record's 225 miles an hour - and she's well over that already!

Two hundred and sixty miles an hour! So if Campbell does anything over 190 on the return run, his average will be another record!

And here comes the answer - an average for the two runs of 239 miles an hour! 13 higher than his previous record. Says Campbell: "That's just about Bluebird's limit - but next year, there'll be a strange new animal on Coniston Water!"
