

EYEFUL OF MARGARET IN CANADA:

The Canadian tour of Princess Margaret reaches an impressive peak in southern Ontario. Arriving at Toronto's City Hall the scene is at once informal, and then regal. Clad in modified sack dress to match in color her blue eyes, the visitor from London receives a golden jewel box from Toronto's Mayor Phillips to commemorate her trip to the Queen City. Then, the welcoming acclaim which has been accorded generations of British royalty, guests also of Toronto over the long years.

Visiting Niagara Falls, the 27-year-old Princess now wears a sleeveless chiffon dress and petalled cloche hat. She meets a real Mohawk Indian chief.

Quick change to hooded raincoat to view the Canadian and US falls. Even as tourists do, she asks: "How do you know where the dividing line is between the US and Canada?" "In the middle of the river", is the reply.

Another day, another stylish change of costume. Now in eastern Ontario, at the capital, Ottawa, she attends opening ceremonies for the new three-and-a-half million dollar City Hall.

If she is weary after many busy days of travel, the Princess hardly shows it. Gracious as befits her station, lovely as befits a fairy princess, she wins new friends in the Dominion.