INTERPOL SEES YARD:

Police heads of 42 countries had a busman's holiday when they dropped into Scotland Yard. They were in London for an international conference to discuss greater co-operation in the fight against crime. Stolen cars, they learned, are one of the biggest headaches of the London Police. In the Metropolitan area nearly 100 vehicles are reported missing every week. The locality of each theft is noted and many cars are recovered.

The Swiss police took much interest in the organisation of police cars patrols, seeing how the Yard keeps minute-by-minute track of the cars, and so is able to direct the nearest one to the scene of reported crime. The rare criminal who gets out of the country is reported to the international body, Interpol, and they do the rest.
