

POUNDS SWIM TO SALE.

To the islands off the coast of Virginia holiday crowds came to enjoy the summer pony-round-up. At low tide the colts and their parents had to swim to Chincoteague Island for the annual sale. It makes a sight for which folks come from hundreds of miles around. For the rest of the year the animals roam wild. They're a breed of their own, half way between pony and horse.

Safe ashore, they're driven to the corral, where the sale takes place. Only the colts are sold. Later on the rest are set free again.

The islands are a wild life refuge, less than 300 miles from New York.
