NEKRUMAH FLIES TO BALMORAL

Welcome guest of Britain, arriving at London Airport, was Dr. Nkrumah; fifty next month, Prime Minister of Ghana since 1952. He comes mainly to discuss the situation, now that the Queen cannot visit his country in November. A special emissary to Ghana had told him why. But Dr. Nkrumah does not regard the visit as cancelled.

"We are looking upon this as a postponement that the coming to Ghana is merely postponed. We are expecting her to come at any time that She is well to do so".

Would it be a good thing if the baby had a Ghanaian name?

"Naturally for us"

To Downing Street, Dr. Nkrumah motored to lunch with Mr. Macmillan. They talked afterwards of Ghana's wish to become a republic within the Commonwealth and to unite with Guinea. Dr. Nkrumah later flew to Balmoral.

Meanwhile, changing the guard at the Palace draws an even larger audience than usual, rather to the sentries' embarrassment. Naturally, holidaymakers and tourists take increased interest in royal matters, as the result of Her Majesty's announcement. Guardsmen think something ought to be done to protect them from too much curiosity.

At Balmoral, it's hoped that the public will respect the Queen's wish to be left in peace. But outside nearby Crathie Church, on Sunday, hundreds gathered in the expectation of seeing her arrive. Small wonder that Her Majesty chose to worship in the Castle. There, she can enjoy family life. There, as these pictures taken a few years ago show, the Queen, Duke and the children have some of their happiest hours.

All the Queen's subjects hope that she will have a most enjoyable holiday and fully recover from the strain of her recent tour.
