

FAREWELL, NKRUMAH.

At the Ghana High Commissioner's office the staff and others said goodbye to Dr. Nkrumah, who saw for the first time the bust made of him by the Italian sculptor Castaudella. Ghana's first Premier signed the visitors' book, a signature commemorating a brief, but every important visit to Britain. Then it had to be a goodbye for Dr. Nkrumah was returning home. During his stay he visited the Queen at Balmoral, to talk about the revised arrangements for a royal visit to his country, and he was made a Privy Councillor.

Tilbury was Dr. Nkrumah's port of exit. In every way the time he spent in this country was both memorable and pleasant. He discussed important matters with Mr. Macmillan and the Minister of Commonwealth Relations. And Ghana will long remember that her Premier was one of the first to be given the news (then secret) that the Queen was expecting a baby. So farewell to a friend, Dr. Nkrumah...
