

PRINCESS OPENS EXHIBITION.

Lord Provost Myer Galpern escorted Princess Margaret when she came to Glasgow to open the third Scottish Industries Exhibition, in Kelvin Hall. It all showed that industry north of the Border is flourishing. And what a diversity of manufactures Scotland has to exhibit. A million people are expected to visit Kelvin Hall before the Exhibition closes. With fine sailing waters almost on Glasgow's doorstep, it's not surprising that boats make a brave show and draw a lot of attention.

Bathrooms become more beautiful every year. Pity we don't get up earlier and have more time to appreciate them. But cleanliness isn't all, as this latest-type whisky-still proves. Wanted - a domestic model.

How's this? A firm has made some quiet bagpipes. They're for budding pipe-majors and girl pipers; this is, for beginners who haven't got rid of their musical L plates. South of the Border, perhaps this type ought to be made compulsory everywhere. In these cash-and-grab days there's a safety handbag. It has a built-in alarm.

When the bag is snatched, the wrist-chain starts the alarm.

Heavy industry gets a good showing; caterpillar tractors for example. In every way Scottish industry's on the up and up.
