

MEET BABY GORILLA.

First, meet mother Gorilla. Poor Archilla seems bewildered. She doesn't want anything to do with her new baby. Nor, apparently, does the father, Stephi. It's his first child, and that's always rather a trial.

Lots of people wanted to photograph Stephi, but his fame seemed too much for him.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Lang, wife of the Basle Zoo Director, is looking after Baby Goma herself. The little thing only weighed four pounds at birth; very tiny considering that a grown up gorilla can weigh 30 stone or more. Goma had to be taken away from it's mother because she wouldn't feed it. Now it has a bottle every three hours.

The baby's progress interests zoological experts all over the world. Goma is only the second gorilla born in captivity, and the first in Europe. If it lives, it'll be a big feather in Mrs. Lang's cap. She's very happy indeed to be holding the baby.
