PEOPLE IN THE NEWS.

Making one of his now rare public appearances, Sir Winston Churchill went to his constituency, Woodford to see his statue unveiled. The privilege of performing the ceremony was accorded to Lord Montgomery of Alamein, far better known by the name Monty, which, as Winston once said himself, is a household word. However, not the Field Marshal but his wartime chief, held the centre of the stage now. Sir Winston Churchill is portrayed here in two tons of bronze, nine feet high.

The essence of Sir Winston Churchill is caught in the brilliant sculpture of David McFall.

The Duke of Edinburgh went to St. Athan RAF Station, a few miles from Cardiff, to see what progress is being made in his award scheme by youth of these parts. Several youth organisations, schools and clubs, as well as ATC cadets were present. The Duke sportingly sampled the cooking.

Any member of a boys' or girls' organisation can enter for the Duke's Award Scheme. By showing skill in the various activities (mountain-rescue work for example,) they can win a certificate signed by him.

The Award Scheme is doing its part to make the coming generation of men and women the kind of citizens Britain wants.
