

HEADLINE STUNTS.

Londoners who saw punts travelling along the streets hadn't had one ever the night. It was in aid of World Refugee Year. Cambridge University challenged Oxford and London to a novel race from the Capital to Cambridge; the refugees to benefit by collections on the way. Each punt had a crew of six, taking it in turns, and the qualifications insisted on by Oxford and Cambridge was that their men must have once fallen into the river fully dressed. The pram undercarriages suffered on the way, but that was all part of the fun. The 56-mile race was won by London, forty minutes ahead of the Light Blues. It being more or less a boat race, Oxford were last.

Off like a shot into the night. This time it was men of Leicester University, celebrating Rag Week with a pram race from the Capital to Leicester. Competing were teams from Leicester itself, London and Hatfield Technical College. At the end of their stunt the pram pushers retired to their coach. The Race was called the Prix des Pram. It didn't count in the World Driving Championships. The distance was 100 miles. When at last the leading driver came in sight of Leicester University, he was one of their own students.

For the winners, a barrel of beer. Well and truly earned.
