

SCOTLAND V. ENGLAND.

North of the border, the vintage match of the year. Scotland, on the left, versus England. 130,000 saw England kick-off. Here at Hampden Park, Scotland haven't beaten their old enemies for 27 years. And with England on the attack early on, setting Charlton in motion on the left, there were fears in the crowd, but the ball went over the bar.

Scotland soon got over that shock. A mistake by England's new centre half, Slater; Leggatt pounced on the ball. Goal to Scotland.

Two minutes later, England thought they'd equalised. Out of Haffye's hands, Baker headed a ball in.. The referee said "Foul" Goal disallowed.

For the rest of that half, Scotland did everything but score. They deserved more than their one-nil lead at half-time.

Second half. Scotland now had to play against the strong wind and facing the sun. Denis Law, best forward on the field, setn Weir away on the left. The winger centred well, back to Law, but there was no luck that time.

• Not long after the resumption Charlton was tackled from behind by Duncan Mackay, and to general Scottish dismay the Hungarian referee awarded England a penalty. Charlton himself took it. England were level.

It was bad luck for Scotland to lose the lead in that way. They hoped this 'corner' might produce a goal. The kick was met by a Leggatt-header. A very narrow escape for England.

Another penalty for England. Haffey saved Charlton's kick, but the referee ordered it, to be taken again. Caldow having stepped over the line. And this time, Charlton sent the ball wide. Poetic justice.

Scotland ought to have scored several goals, but they didn't. Partly because of the magnificent goal-keeping of Ron Springett. So the unsatisfactory International was a one-one draw.
