

THE QUEEN SEES HER SCOUTS.

Chief Scout Sir Charles Maclean inspected one thousand Queen's Scouts at Windsor. Scouting needs scout-masters, here a well built bunch.

Present by invitation were several boys from Commonwealth countries. There was great satisfaction that Her Majesty was to take the salute. It had been feared that having caught a chill at the Badminton Horse Trials she would not be able to appear.

Sea Scouts had the honour this year of providing the Colour Party.

How well Scouting endures. The world total is eight-and-a-half million, and the numbers are growing. Queen's Scouts are those who've won the maximum awards; but always remembered at this function are the sick and crippled boys. They include polio cases, yet for all their handicaps they're proud to belong to the movement founded by that great boys' hero, Baden Powell. Proud, too, of the patronage of Her Majesty the Queen.
