

AUTOS ARE BIG NEWS.

This car made history. Metering historian St. John Nixon was about to make history repeat itself. 60 years ago this Wolsely Voiturette took part in the 1900 Thousand-Mile Trial. The old car is powered by a horizontal, single-cylinder engine, developing about five horse power. As a boy of 14, Nixon rode with the famous S.F. Edge on that Trial. Now he hopes to drive the Wolsely over the same route. So far as is known it's the only vehicle still existing that hit that gallant trail in 1900. Everybody wished the veteran the best of luck.

Next auto in the news isn't a pleasure-car; it's called the Spacemaker. Not because it goes into orbit; but because it makes light of heavy lifting, clears floor space in no time, and can even lift cars. Powered by its own electric batteries, it makes no fumes, a big advantage for work indoors. Outside, having lifted loads of nearly a ton-and-a-half, the Spacemaker can carry them at 12 miles an hour.

Motorists harassed by No Parking rules hope Mr. Marples won't see this thing, or before long the tow-you-away police will be using it.
