

TRAIN SLASHING.

Alarming on the increase on British Railways is wilful damage to trains. At a first-aid depot at Wimbledon Park, experts quickly note what repairs are necessary. If vandalism goes on at this rate it will cost British Railways half-a-million pounds before the end of the year. It doesn't only happen in London; most big cities have the same trouble.

The first-aid depots keep hard at it to get the trains back into service. But at week-ends the vandals really enjoy themselves, wrecking all they can; tables, cushions, windows, arm-rests, anything goes. It's incredible. Removing mirrors is very popular. The taxpayer foots the bill, so it's in everybody's interest to report any vandal they see. The senseless craze must be stopped.
