MISSILE V. TANK.

The Royal Armoured Corps held a demonstration to show the near-perfection pitch now reached by tank-gunnery. Experts in other military branches were very interested.

Top of the bill was the Malkara Guided Missile, which may all but revolutionize tank-tactics, simply because it CAN BE guided.

The Malkara was dead on the target at nearly 2,000 yards. It didn't carry an explosive head, as of course it would do in real war. After the Malkara the display took a more conventional turn, but it all went to show that the British Army is well abreast of the times in the armoured field; in fact, almost poaching on submarine preserves.

They don't worry about any obstacles ahead. The motto seems to be, we'll cross that bridge when we come to it.
