BRAEMAR GATHERING.

In fine Scottish style the programme announces "The Gathering of the Braemar Royal Highland Society will be held in the Princess Royal and Duke of Fife Memorial Park". And what a Highland Festival it is.

Royal, the Gathering is, essentially, from Victorian times till today. Braemar would be unthinkable without the presence of the Royal Family. Their arrival brought forth the full throated welcome from 30,000 loyal spectators. There was a difference this year; Princess Margaret was no longer single, and was accompanied by her husband. This was that most of the people in that great arena had seen Mr. Anthony Armstrong Jones.

And now for the kilted Olympics; feats of skill and strength, all typically Scottish as the Highland dancing itself.

The special Braemar caber, an outsize affair, was well and truly thrown.

At nearby Balmoral Castle, it's a very memorable holiday for the Queen and her family. For here is Prince Andrew, seven months old, as bonny a baby as any proud mother could wish. And these are the first pictures in colour, taken of the infant prince. Even black and white films would be heart warming, but how much colour adds to the beauty and realism. As we watch the pictures, we almost seem to be at Balmoral ourselves.

This young man, who is destined to be familiar with the camera all his life, certainly isn't camera shy. What a lovely smile.

Out of the pram now, and on to the lawn. It's obvious that the Queen is a very happy mother; also that the baby is very much the centre of attraction for the whole family. His brother and sister adore him. Princess Anne is quite the little mother.

The only member of the party not, perhaps completely happy is the corgi dog; feeling apparently just a bit out of the picture.

This Newsworld is privileged to present a delightful record, in colour, of the intimate family scene. The Queen interrupted her holiday to have these films made. She will be rewarded by the knowledge that the whole free world will see these unforgettable pictures of the Royal Family and its newest member, Prince Andrew.
