

CONGO ANGERS STUDENTS.

Students of London University, many of them Africans, made a protest march, blaming Belgium for the political murder of Lumumba. His death has unleashed passions, as well as a lot of calculated political anger, all over the world.

Hyde Park is the traditional place for letting off steam. In its way that is a safety valve. People who are free to talk don't fly to the violence which is common in many countries, though outside the Belgian Embassy it was tough and go for a time. The London police were patient beyond praise.

When the Security Council debated the Lumumba murder, Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold encountered Russian demands that he should resign. Dag remained calm. He had the warm support of the western nations, and the firm personal backing of America's new man at UNO, Adlai Stevenson, who said the United Nations must stay in the Congo.
