ANGRY TEACHERS MARCH

Hundreds of members of the National Union of Teachers express their feelings outside Union headquarters in London. They're not sure who's angered them more - the Minister of Education who scaled down their pay rises, or their own Executive who first called a one-day strike and then called it off. This was to have been the Day; and as it's half term anyway for many schools, more than a thousand very cross teachers are in London to tell both their Union and their M.P.s. what they think about it all.

Meanwhile, inside the Commons, Minister Eccles says he is not bound by the local authorities' promise of new pay talks next year - the promise that stopped the strike. That won't smooth anyone's temper:
