

TRAWLERS RETURN TO PORT

The beautiful Bay of Naples makes a grand water colour background for the trawlers as they return from their foraging. It's homecoming after many weeks of battle with the elements, a battle that must go on even in times of peace. And this time the catch has been good. The pontoons are tightly packed with shimmering sea food and each load means full speed ahead for one or other of the groups who look after the salting, filleting, the branding, the boxing and so on. Preparing the nation's breakfast is a fussy business. But soon the last stages are reached and another consignment of fresh fish is on its way to the capital, the fishing fleet's in port again.
