

BRITISH TROOPS FROM NORWAY.

Our men are back home in Britain, back from Central Norway. But though they have temporarily retired from the fight,... they are not dismayed. Their hardships have taught us a lesson, which we must never forget. That no nation is safe against the Nazis, no campaign can be carried through against the German war machine unless we can also carry the war in the air. That is a fact, that the difficulties of these men has finally brought home. And from now on we must burn it into our hearts.

General Ironside, Chief of the Imperial General Staff, is here to welcome them back. He puts into words what we all feel. We are proud of the way in which they have faced hellish bombardments from the air. We are proud of the way they fought, and proud of the way they retired when ordered to do so. It isn't their fault that they're back home again.
