HORSES

The thoroughbreds of the hunting shires of England are famous the world over, and they too are playing a four-footed part in the national war effort. Veterinary surgeons from France have come over to choose horses for service in the French Army and only the bluest of blue bloods are selected. They inspect their teeth, they measure them, they look them in the eye and not even the cleverest horse can put one across the experts. Soon the best will be on their way to France, marked for the service of the allies.
