

WITH THE R.A.F.

In this phase of Germany's Total War, no tribute is too high or too often repeated, for the men and machines of the allied Air Forces. Here is the Royal Air Force, on the Airfields of Northern France, and they're preparing a few more hot ones for Jerry.

Two more into the bag, and when its open again... there'll be a nasty mess somewhere.

Now the young pilots map the course for their next raid, to make sure they'll only be attacking military objectives. And that's something the Bosch never bothers to do. So once again the Heavy bombers of Britain are heading towards Germany.

A few seconds later, another squadron of bombers returns.. to ~~bring~~ bring back stories of oil tanks ablaze, enemy air fields pot marked with bomb craters, German mechanised units blasted off the road.

Men of the Royal Air Force,

We salute you!
