

UNIFORMS, KHAKI, TROOPS FOR THE USE OF.

Clothing Factories are jammed with miles of textiles as the United States army prepares for increased man-power. On the shrinking machines go thousands of yards of cloth in the first step to keep the army clothed. On the designing boards the patterns are marked for tall and short, fat and thin... and there's plenty of choice for the soldier. The sturdy fabric goes to the cutting room, where knives slice easily through one hundred and twenty layers of cloth at a time. From the cutting room the Uniforms pass to sewing machines. The biggest man will get a fit!

In a short while there'll be "Pants, Pants, for elephants, in the Quartermaster's Store".
