KING AND QUEEN VISIT RAIDED AREAS.

The King visits the Air Ministry, where he is received by Sir Archibald Sinclair, Sir Cyril Newall and Sir Hugh Seely.

A call at the Ministry of Home Security follows, and the King leaves in company with General Bartholomew and Sir Louis Greig.

Both visits precede a tour by the King and Queen of bombed areas in London. To Fulham Their Majesties bring a cheery word, and the Queen, especially, a friendly smile. As they walk with difficulty among the wreckage, they are greatly moved by the wanton havoc wrought by the Hun.

At intervals the Royal party halt to have a word with A.R.P. workers, demolition squads and firemen, who have done such splendid work at so great a risk; and the Queen smiles again as she insists on shaking the hand of a worker who apologises for its griminess. Having had their own home bombed, Their Majesties speak with understanding and sympathy to those of their subjects who have also fallen victims to Nazi savagery.

As the King and Queen leave, the people of Fulham realise that the link between them and their sovereign is a personal one. Its the way we have in Britain.
