

MECHANISED INFANTRY.

In remote and secluded districts of Britain, regiments are carrying out exercises and daily perfecting themselves in the technique of 1940 warfare. A mobile unit of a famous Infantry Regiment is being rushed up to hold an advance position. Taking advantage of a bank fringing the road, they go into action.

The enemy is now engaged and a large scale encounter seems likely. The main body of infantry is being rapidly brought forward and -- in the words of Stanley Holloway "Let Battle Commence".

Trench Mortars hammer the enemy emplacements.

Okay Butch, give 'em the woicks.

As mock enemy tanks begin to press forward, tank traps, consisting of wire entanglements and land mines, are set. Make it snappy boys, they're coming round the corner. I'm off, its safer in the trenches.
