

WITH THE NAVY.

Units of the Mediterranean Battle Fleet put to sea, seeking conclusions with the enemy. Policing the very waters that wash the Italian Coastline, our warships patrol the Mediterranean ensuring an ever-open highway for British troopships and supply vessels. From Destroyer to Cruiser, mail and orders are transferred. The Senior Service is a mainstay of our operations in this theatre of war. South of Greece lies the small but important island of Crete where men and munitions are continually being disembarked. Upon the Navy and the Merchant Marine falls the gigantic task of shipping all the engines and material of war, for our armies and allies in the field of battle.

British Men of War have penetrated over 100 miles into the Adriatic and shelled Italian held ports of Albania unmolested. Poured hundreds of tons of steel on to the coastal road and fortresses of Libya, and even battered the industrial centres of Genoa in Northern Italy.

Italy has been made to realise once and for all that the Naval might of Britain is imperishable. If there's one tune that should be adopted by Mussolini's Navy it's "The Fleet's in Port again".
