FERRY PILOTS.

The delivery of new aircraft from factories to operational centres is the responsibility of a vast organisation known as the Air Transport Auxiliary, with men of fourteen different nationalities in its ranks. Many of the Ferry Pilots hail from America and the Dominions, and also helping in this important work are several women.

The daily delivery of operational aircraft is only a man's job, Training machines and other less powerful planes are piloted by the women - and its a job they're doing exceedingly well.

At another R.A.F. station, Sir Charles Portal - Sir Dudley Pound - (the First Sea Lord) and the Prime Minister see quite a lot of activity at a section of the Bomber Command. When a twin-motor giant gets under way, the slip stream is no respecter of persons. Well, gentlemen, here's mud in your eye.

Among the planes seen at the aerodrome is a Boeing D.17.

Mr. Churchill had a good look round the Flying Fortress and comes away well satisfied. The immediate future is likely to herald a big increase in the number and strength of bombing raids on enemy territory, and Mr. Churchill has every intention of using the big stick.
