ALLIES MEET IN IRAN.

Gurka Infantry and other Empire troops enter Kermanshah, as from South and West, Britain sends forces into Iran. The Axis-poisoned country of the recently abdicated Shah was once a happy hunting ground for Nazi Agents. The peaceful invasion is watched with interest by Iranian soldiers, as our forces pass in long columns through the towns, to make contact with the Russians coming down from the North. Near the town of Kazvin, the two columns meet, and the long allied front reaching from the Arctic to Libya is joined. British and Russian Commanders shake hands, and the soldiers of Great Britain and the Soviet Union meet for the first time.

Across Iran, three times the size of France, roll the mechanised forces of the Allies, while the people of this ancient land look on with seeming indifference. In the capital city of Teheran, life goes on much the same.

There's that man again - - but he's had his nose badly put out of joint this time.
