GIBRALTAR TODAY.

Here's our old friend "The Rock" back in the news again. Soon after his arrival at Gibraltar, the Duke of Gloucester makes an extensive inspection of various units stationed there. Censorship permits us only to see what we're allowed to see, so don't expect too much.

Accompanied by the Governor of Gibraltar, His Excellency Lord Gort, the Duke watches engineers at work laying explosives on a railway line and makes a comprehensive tour of the maze of underground tunnels for which the Rock is famous.

It's quite a climb to the summit but when he gets there, the Royal visitor is rewarded by a magnificent view of an imposing array of anti-aircraft defences.

Not a sign of hostile aircraft, and Mussolini's Admirals are having afternoon tea, so they fire a couple of rounds at a seagull.

The garrison at Gibraltar has played and continues to play a conspicuous part in the Battle of the Mediterranean. If anyone deserves our praise and admiration, these fellows do. There's not a woman left living there now.
