

KING AND QUEEN WITH THE A. T. A.

The King and Queen spend a morning at the headquarters of the Air Transport Auxiliary. A.T.A. Ferry Pilots include many nationalities, and Miss Pauline Gower who commands the women's branch, and Commander d'Arlander the Chief of the Service, are able to tell Their Majesties about the valuable work of the plane transport organisation. Apart from delivery of aircraft to R.A.F. aerodromes all over the country, many of the pilots have flown the Atlantic several times, bringing big American bombers to Britain.

From where I'm standing (Square six) we get a good view of the Royal visitors preparing to leave. "I think they're all doing a grand and very important job" said the King. And that's the opinion of every one of us.
