Starting in the North we visit one of our aerodromes as General de Gaulle arrives to inspect some of the men of his country, attached to the Free French Squadron of the R.A.F. Similar to our Fleet Air Arm pilots many of these men wear naval uniforms. Quite a few of them have a few Nazi planes to their credit. General de Gaulle's visit calls for a flying display. A formation of aircraft shows fine originality in taking up the position in the Cross of Lorraine, the Free French emblem. Over now to Pennsylvania where an American bomber, forced down on a ploughed field, is hauled over to the main highway for a spectacular take off. There she goes with only inches to spare either side, main traffic routes like these may well be used for emergency landing grounds, until then it's all yours Mr. Motorist. She was only the home guard's daughter but while the old boy's learning fire drill the girls go one better and take up archery. Maybe a new line in targets has something to do with it. Well that takes care of ol' beetle cuss, now what about that steege of his? When you've got to go you've got Tajo, the louse shooting season is open. Flashback to London, out of No. 10, Downing Street come Mr. and Mrs. Churchill to meet leaders of the Free Austrians in Britain. The presentation of a trailer canteen to the Prime Minister results in an informal tea party in the most famous street in the world. Wait a minute, something's missing, it's not confidence, ah yes, Carona.
