

HIGHWAY TO ALASKA

A Camp of American Army Engineers at Fort St. John, British Colombia. The cook has a victory hair-cut despite the low temperatures in these high altitudes. And here's another sign suggesting the home town of some of the soldiers on the job; an engineering project of considerable significance.
 Colonel Hoge is in command of the construction of a new strategic highway across Canadian territory. A thousand miles of road connecting the United States with that most important war base, Alaska. Hard work on a new and vital war-time corridor.

Here's an idea as to where the highway may eventually lead.
 And now to Fort Nelson (also in British Colombia) where the road builders are setting up camp, and building log cabins as living quarters. War or Peace, its still a hearty and healthy life.
 A thousand miles of highway leading into the heart of Alaska - and
