SOUTH AFRICAN COASTAL PATROL.

Cape Town's famous Table Mountain looks down on a South African aerodrome where men of the S.A.A.F. prepare their planes for the pilots setting out on Coastal Patrol. In every country coloured red on the map, the vigilant eyes of Empire Airmen are ever on the lookout for the enemy. A Newsreel cameraman was on the spot, when a routine flight was made which took him over the rugged mass of Table Mountain. Most of us imagined the top to be flat. But see for yourself how it is cut up by ravines, while large pools of water make it a wonderland of its own.

But this is far from being a sight seeing flight. As the plane heads out to sea, a ship invites investigation. Not until her identity is established beyond all doubt does that cautious South African airman head back to base.
