

ADMIRAL DARLAN.

101.
42-972

The notorious Admiral Darlan. These are the first pictures to be released by the Censor of the scene in Algiers at the conclusion of the Armistice in North Africa. The use of Darlan's authority as a temporary expedient has resulted in much controversy. General Eisenhower had to deal with a shifty customer, a man who astutely somersaulted out of the pro)Axis camp, and landed, not in a Nazi Concentration Camp, but among his previously professed enemies watching a parade.

Men like Darlan don't usually stay put for very long, especially when opinions like "Into the drink with the Admiral, we want De Gaulle" are left lying about.

A much more pleasing sight in Algiers is the French submarine CASABLANCA which escaped from Toulon. Strange how the name "White House" has cropped up for the Americans in North Africa. CASABIANCA... MAISON BLANCHE and CASABLANCA all mean the same thing in three different languages. CASABLANCA was not the only submarine to get away. The MARSOUIN made a dash for it and is now a free and Fighting Frenchman.
