TITLE.:- WHAT A RELIEF.

Picture.:- It's as good as a birthday to the lighthouse-keeper when the day for his relief arrives.

He throws out a line to the relief --
--ship, and hauls in the cable which --
--establishes connection with civilization once more.

The relieving keeper then sets out on his risky little trip, by cable railway, from ship to lighthouse, waving goodbye to his mates as he goes.

When the formalities of taking over are -- --completed, the very-much-relieved keeper comes aboard by the same method, bringing with him his luggage, in this instance a diminutive case of personal effects! You can wager he's glad to be out of the confined space of the lighthouse for a time.

Good bye, lads! Good luck!

Thus they settle down once more to watch over those who go down to the sea in ships.
