TITLE. :- JILL TARS.

Picture. :- The "Aleyon" is a trim little craft. She goes for fifteen-day cruises from France, along the English coast, with crews who are just as trim as the ship. They are all young ladies, who want the thrill of a new experience -- under the orders of Captain Hebert.

X There are a score of them on this trip, all eager and anxious to learn seamanship - er - seawomanship, without the assistance of mere man. The Captain doesn't count, of course. Their places are booked for them just as though they were passengers -- first come, first to serve.

It is looked upon as good fun, and how happy they are when, with a long pull and a strong one, up comes the anchor, and the good ship noses her way out of the harbour into the Channel. I wonder if they ever find a stowaway aboard ? It would be rather like asking for trouble, I think.

There are plenty of other ways of losing your eye-sight without having your eyes scratched out by the crew of a sailing ship !
