THE TROUBLE IN THE FAR EAST - Chinese flee in panic before advancing Japanese at Tientsin, China-

Picture.:- To all these poor Chinese refugees terror has come. The-- --bridge over the Hai-i-Ho river is--

--a scene of mad confusion, as the inhabitants-- --of the district flee without caring where; or maybe stop to--

--gather up what goods they can carry and--

--find some place where oncoming Japanese may not penetrate.

Most make for the Austrian concession, where they hope for protection--

--against the invaders of their home city, the--

--enemy encamped in the heart of Tientsin.

From this ancient drum gate, the panic-stricken human current is guided towards the foreign-- --settlement and safety. The situation--

--is held well in-- --hand, and sporadic disturbances are soon checked. Most evil doers are busy getting--

--away from this other--

--menace which threatens their freedom in a different way.

Meanwhile the Jap troops reinforce by sand banks and machine guns--

--the barricades which were attacked by the-- --Chinese last month. Japan says she doesn't want Manchuria.

It would cost her too much to run. But she must protect her own interests, and--

--she is protecting them, and taking no chances.

All natives are searched for guns. The Japs claim there's no war going on.

They may be right, but it's a very good imitation of it !
