50,000 EGGS - Poultrymen co-operate in world's largest Hatcheries at Billingham, Washington.

Picture:- Here is one place where they--

--count their chickens before they're hatched. This great incubator mothers 50 thousand eggs at one time. Every day ten-- --thousand chicks break cover, and start scratching their way through-- --life until they're given a place of honour at table. The fluffy yellow balls are kept only two-- --days and then sold for about six pounds each--

--to farmers and poultrymen,--

--whose job in life is to supply birds for hungry diners. Hatching eggs by these scientific--

--foster mothers is now the 3rd largest industry--

--in the state of Washington. It makes the-- --old hard working barnyard fowl nearly a lady--

--of leisure. I wonder if she's grateful for all the trouble it saves her.
