The last of the forty-million pounds German "Grand Fleet" is taken on her humiliated way to the-- --scrap yards. Being towed upside-down, she must feel humiliated and upset. For twelve years the "Prinz--

--Regent Luitpold" lay on the sea's bottom at Scapa Flow after her adventures in the Great War. Gradually certain ships of the Fleet were raised by salvage contractors. The floating of this one finishes their work.

Once a powerful scientific engine of death. A warship is a tragic example of her own utter futility. Her ultimate fate is to be broken up for the value of her steel.

We may unwittingly soon shave with a British razor blade, made of German battleship steel, or sleep peacefully on a spring mattress, which once knew no rest--

--from the movement of waters. "To what strange ends do we serve, oh my masters?"
