

PLEBISCITE DAY.

IN THE SAAR.

Saarbruecken, Saturday 12th January, nineteen thirty five.

Crowds-----

-----are flocking into the town to be-----

---up early in the morning-----

-----to vote - for what? ----- -----Saarbruecken, Sunday the thirteenth. The day----- for which German Saarlanders have waited for fifteen years in thousands-----

----they line up -----

----- to record their votes-----

-----Great precautions have----- -----been taken to keep the ballot secret. All sorts of scares have been purveyed by one side and another -----

----but arrangements for filling in papers make it possible for each individual to vote just as he----- ----wishes. One of the most distinguished German citizens has just entered to register his voice. There is no doubt where he will put his cross. It is Von Papen, famous during the German monarchy and equally famous since the Republic was declared. Flashlights startle with their short-lived brilliant Cameras click as pressmen secure their pictures----- -----of the man who has been German chancellor.

NATURAL SOUND UP.

Saarbruecken on the fourteenth of January. All votes have been cast and-----

----there remains the prodigious task---- --- of the count. In Wartburg Hall guarded by British and--- ---other troops, the boxes are opened and the tally commenced.

-----Crowds wait outside the whole-----

---day. But the result is not declared until early---- --- on Tuesday morning, the --- fifteenth. Special broadsheets----- are distributed showing the----

----solidarity of the----- ---- German vote to return to ----- ----their country. As if by magic, the Swastika appears everywhere and crowds turn the town into a -----

----bear garden. A ----- --- joyful bear garden. In the general exuberance, British Tommies are hoisted high on German shoulders; Deutsch ist alle; German is ~~XXXXXXXXXX~~

-----the Saar once again. One funeral is seen; the coffin contains all----- ---- the remains of Herr Status Quo -----

---- Fifteen years of international government has not change Germans into anything else but Germans. There was one battle--

--- furious and hard fought, but it was waged with snowballs between men of the East Lancashires.
