J-582 171

THE "SEA DEVIL"

GERMAN WAR RAIDER HERE.

Picture.

This 'plane brings a romantic figure of the War. A German naval officer, who is, incidentally one of the best fellows I have ever met, Count Felix Von Luckner, alies the 'Sea Devil'. A raider who did enormous

damage to Allied shipping, but never took a single life. While here, You Luckner will probably meet Admiral Sir Reginald Hall, who as chief of our naval intelligence, organised the chase after the innocent-looking sailing ship 'Seeadler', commanded by the sea-devil. Von Luckner, who did actually start sailor life before the mast, will himself speak to you.

It is quite true that I was responsible for the destruction of five-million-pounds-worth of British and Allied shipping during the Great War.

It was my job t

........

........

In sinking all those ships, I was eareful not to deprive one mother of a son, one wife of a husband, one sweetheart of a lover.

It was not my job !

I did not feel like a warrior, I felt just a sailor.

Life was full of thrills in those days, By Joe ?

On one occasion, my elipper "Secadler", disguised as an innocent Morwegian, got through the British blockade, assisted by a snow-hurricane.

South of Iceland my ship was stopped by a British cruiser, and examined.

My cabin-boy was dressed as a woman, and was presented by me as my wife!

I was believed, they wished us a Merry Christmas, and& we were allowed to go.

After that we sent scores of vessels to the bottom of the sea, but without eausing the death of so much as a ship's cat t

It was just fate that, after all the dangers through which we passed, my trusty little 'clipper should end her days wreeked on a coral reef in the South Seas !

That was nearly twenty years ago, and, although they were stirring times, I would not wish history to repeat itself !