TRAFALGAR DAY.

130th ANNIVERSARY.

Picture:- In memory of a vital, a glorious day one-hundred-and-thirty-years ago. Had the Battle of Trafalgar been a defeat instead of the great victory that it was, Britain's history would have made poor reading, if indeed it would have been worth reading at all. The most romantic celebration of the Battle, which almost deified one Horatio Nelson, takes place at Portsmouth. Here still lies Nelson's wooden ship the 'Victory'. And here is flown his immortal signal "England expects that every man this day will do his duty." On the spot where Nelson was mortally wounded, an annual memorial wreath is placed.

A symbol saluted in spirit by the whole of Britain's naval might. British history provides an inspiring background to our wonderful heritage. Let our present and future deserve the glorious past.
