Firelight to come

London: Royal Review of Police.

London: Royal tribute to the "men-in-blue" well-deserved recognition endorsed by the Nation, when the Queen (accompanied by the Duke of Edinburgh) reviewed Britain's Police Forces, in Hyde Park. Her Majesty was escorted by Sir John Nott-Bower, Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, who rode "Winston" the Queen's famous mount at Trooping the Colour parades (BRING UP)

The inspection over, the Queen took the Salute at a march-past - led by the Mounted Section - men who have restrained, so patiently, the crowds at Cup Finals, Royal Processions or political gatherings (BRING UP)

From across the Border - Massed Pipers led the Scottish contingents (BRING UP)

Royal recognition, too, for the Women's Forces, who combine tact, charm and efficiency often in difficult situations. The post-war recruit, the brave four-footed constable - and the mechanised section - all representing 76,000 men and women throughout Britain, the constant Guardians of Law and Order (BRING UP)

The following day - on the lawns of Buckingham Palace, the Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh mingled with over 7,000 guests at a Presentation Party (BRING UP)

And Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother helped her daughter to receive the many guests who were presented. Our camera also picked out Sir Winston Churchill (BRING UP)

And Mr. Douglas Fiarbanks (BRING UP)

Our now to Germany, where Princess Margaret's three-day visit to the British Forces has been marred by bleak, wintry weather. At Sennelager the Princess watched an impressive display by the famous 11th Armoured Division, said to be the most modern mechanised unit in the British Army. But at the end of a chilly occasion - the R.A.F. turned on the heat with display of precision bombing (BRING UP)
