

Seventy stories above street level, on a New York skyscraper, a Japanese gentleman demonstrated his new invention. It was a solar stove --- which enables him to cook by the heat of the sun. In three hours he cooked a bowl of rice. There's bound to be a big rush to buy these stoves; because the sun is the only kind of fuel that's absolutely free....Until they think of some way to tax it.

FLOODS.

These were the floods that ravaged parts of the north-east coast of America earlier in ~~the year~~ 1955. Many lives were lost and some towns were virtually blotted out. But the courage and the energy of the survivors ^{have} ~~has~~ already transformed many of the devastated areas. In time for Christmas --- they're almost back to normal. Houses and shops are ready for the festive season, as if nothing had happened.

ARCHERY.

In Texas --- they know more about guns than they do about bows and arrows; but in the land of the six-shooter, archery has become the latest craze.

Never too young to learn; --- a four-year-old is right on target and so is his sister Judy. [^] But still they think it best to use a dummy, for the famous legend of William Tell. ~~and~~ The one who hits it, is champion of Dallas, Texas.

SLED DOGS.

When they get snow in New Hampshire, U.S.A. they get plenty of it --- so before it comes, the members of the New England Sled-Dog Club, put the young huskies into training with sleds on wheels. The training course is ~~just~~ ^{a must} over eight miles long; and for the huskies, it's ~~in~~ ^{a must} in the dust before they can mush in the slush.
